How a fortune 100 financial services company transformed its basic servicing communications into improved customer experiences

For one large, U.S Fortune 100 financial services firm that provides investment and retirement services for millions of members, customer experience management was a top priority. However, the organization determined that many key communications for a retirement record-keeping service had become unmanageable. The service was unable to facilitate the kind of positive user experience they wanted to deliver. This prompted them to seek the help of Messagepoint, which quickly became an important partner in helping the organization with its current and future goals to make its customer communications more efficient and effective.

CHALLENGE

Unmanageable communications

The company manages member communications for several large clients—each with its own requirements for branding, regulatory, and messaging content. The existing legacy system in place prevented them from scaling beyond the 17 existing client deployments, which was a considerable concern. There were additional worries that changes to communications for new clients could lead to service issues to existing clients.

SOLUTION

Putting business users back in control

The organization needed a solution that would empower its marketing department to directly execute changes and enhancements to communications, enable co-branding, and update designs to refresh the look and feel of its group retirement communications, ensuring they were visually appealing and easy to understand.

After evaluating several CMS and message management solutions, conducting an RFP and POCs, the firm selected Messagepoint and its cloud-based customer communications management (CCM) solution for their content management needs.
